

The New York Times

Thursday, March 1, 2007

F3

GLASSWARE

A Centenarian Offers a Toast To a Young Millennium

The designer Eva Zeisel, now 100 years old, is still at work: last week in her Upper West Side apartment she was reviewing prototypes of her Centennial goblets, six designs that will be introduced at the Architectural Digest Home Design Show at Pier 94 in Manhattan from March 8 through 11. Running her fingers over the six goblets, she said she particularly liked two with more bulbous stems. "There's the pleasure of holding," she said. "It's sensual." Ms. Zeisel designed an earlier version — a seven-inch-high martini glass — in 2000, at the request of Bombay Sapphire gin. The new goblets are 11½ inches high and are intended primarily as decorative objects, though she said with a twinkle that they might be O.K. for drinking — "by giants." The Classic, below, is $700; the others are $500 to $2,100, through evazeiseloriginals.com.

ELAINE LOUIE

Brent C. Brolin